

It may be fate, but we should still plan for it!

End-of-life planning is a difficult subject to talk about, even for experienced social service professionals. In most Asian and Pacific Islander cultures, death is a taboo subject. To make matters worse, many API immigrants don't know much about the American system of decision-making, end-of-life planning, and privacy laws.

Service providers working with API seniors frequently hear:

- What's an advance directive? I thought doctors let my kids decide.
- Does putting my loved one in hospice care mean I've given up?
- I didn't realize the wide choices and ranges in cost for a funeral.
- My relatives live far away. What will happen to me?

Join us for presentations and discussions about how we as service providers can prepare our communities and reduce stress for clients.
